Trump now likely to lose the popular vote.
Which is great, because our country really needs another thing to fight about.

Call me crazy, but it'd be great if we could enact reform that didn't make the working and middle class pay more for health care.

Replying to @JDVance1

There is a way to do that, but it requires scaling back the "essential services" requirements for a basic health insurance plan.

Eh. Repealing essential services without a lot of other structural reforms (and premium support) probably doesn't help much.

You really don't know much about this issue, do you? There is a way through refundable tax credits and more market options.

Refundable tax credits—premium support. And "more market options" is a good idea, but simply repealing EHBs w/o those reforms isn't enough.

Of course, but there is more to it than that. That is why this is not easy to resolve, and failed Obamacare makes it more difficult.

I don't write the headlines. The piece is clearly not trying to solve the problem "what should health reform look like."

Everyone has skills + talents > job title + diploma

Drivers analyze routes, secretaries fix IT networks

@OpptyatWork nyti.ms/2v36C7P

Meanwhile, employers hire based on credentials that job applicants can't change — a college degree or previous job title — rather than assessing the skills an applicant has developed, said Mr. Auguste, who was an economic adviser in the Obama administration. He said the approach should instead be, "If you learned it at Harvard or Cal State Northridge or on the job as a secretary or in the Navy or as a volunteer, awesome."

If you see an article extolling how cheap Medicaid is without acknowledging its abysmal health outcomes, you should be skeptical.

"Hillbilly Elegy" is a memoir by J.D. Vance, a man from a poor, rural background who grew up in a family of Appalachian descent. The book details his struggles with poverty, addiction, and the challenges of moving from a rural environment to a more affluent one. It is a powerful and moving story that resonates with many readers.

Hillbilly Elegy

A Memoir of a Family and Culture in Crisis

J.D. Vance

Ο J.D. Vance, συγγραφέας του Hillbilly Elegy, μιλάει για την εμπειρία του στην εσωτερική μεσοτάξη της Αμερικής. Πώς η κοινωνία μας αντιμετωπίζει την ανισότητα και την ανεργία. Πώς η κοινωνία μας αντιμετωπίζει την ανισότητα και την ανεργία.

Thanks to everyone who encouraged me to run, but it's just not a good time. A bit more color below.

I am truly honored by everyone who encouraged me to run for the senate this year. I thought seriously about running in August 2017, but decided that the timing was awful for my young family. Some things have changed since then, but not enough to make running a good idea. Our Rise of the Rest fund has raised $150 million to invest in early stage businesses (both inside and outside of my home state), my nonprofit organization is on the verge of bringing an addiction specialist into Ohio to help fill some significant treatment gaps, and I've still got a family that needs more of my time than a political campaign would permit. I'd rather focus on these things. So count me out of politics for now.

Thanks to everyone who encouraged me to run, but it's just not a good time. A bit more color below.

I am truly honored by everyone who encouraged me to run for the senate this year. I thought seriously about running in August 2017, but decided that the timing was awful for my young family. Some things have changed since then, but not enough to make running a good idea. Our Rise of the Rest fund has raised $150 million to invest in early stage businesses (both inside and outside of my home state), my nonprofit organization is on the verge of bringing an addiction specialist into Ohio to help fill some significant treatment gaps, and I've still got a family that needs more of my time than a political campaign would permit. I'd rather focus on these things. So count me out of politics for now.

I am truly honored by everyone who encouraged me to run for the senate this year. I thought seriously about running in August 2017, but decided that the timing was awful for my young family. Some things have changed since then, but not enough to make running a good idea. Our Rise of the Rest fund has raised $150 million to invest in early stage businesses (both inside and outside of my home state), my nonprofit organization is on the verge of bringing an addiction specialist into Ohio to help fill some significant treatment gaps, and I've still got a family that needs more of my time than a political campaign would permit. I'd rather focus on these things. So count me out of politics for now.

We in Huntington, WV have yearned for an outside entity to swoop in and save us-never happened. What HAS happened, slowly, is a revitalization of downtown led by LOCAL businesses and now downtown is thriving, attracting great mix of young/old to eat/shop/relax. @HuntingtonMayor

The idea that southern Ohio, eastern Kentucky, and WV have lower levels of religious adherence, when measured by regular attendance, is not exactly controversial. Something that ARDA shows pretty consistently.

This is why I trust Ben Shapiro. He has retweeted multiple rebuttals to his original criticism of Kavanaugh without comment, let alone snark. This will only cause me to trust him even more and seek him out in the future.

This segment and its response gets at something that really bothers me. Consider two views:

What fresh hell is this!???

Kavanaugh's assistant Zina Bash giving the white power sign right behind him during the hearing? This alone should be disqualifying!!

She might not be racist, but she surely needs to understand what a signa means before she flashes it on national television.

One of the most infuriating parts of the last few weeks has been the garbage published about my friend Amy Chua. I just wrote a note to the Yale Law School dean defending Amy. Here's the meat of it, for those interested.

I don't believe the worst of the charges against Amy—among them, that she told women that Judge Kavanaugh only hires women who look like models. I'm obviously biased, as this charge is an implicit criticism of women who, like my wife, clerked for Judge Kavanaugh and adore him. But I don't believe them because I never heard her say anything like that, and neither did anyone else I know and speak to.

But there's something more pernicious at work in the criticism of Amy Chua. She is undoubtedly unfiltered. And I'm sure she sometimes phrases things in a way other people, most of all a law school dean, may not like. But her honesty—and, yes, her lack of a filter—are what make her so valuable to so many students. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale, and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook exam. I needed someone to tell me what YLJ was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

I nearly applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a ZL. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice, about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When I told Amy I wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." She then gave me perhaps the best piece of advice I have ever received, when she told me to focus instead on a girl I had recently started dating (we met in Amy's class). As you may know, that girl is now my wife, and we have a 15-month-old baby together.

What I'm getting at ultimately goes to questions of class and social capital. Amy may not be the most traditional of mentors, but if you want poor kids and other nontraditional students to succeed at Yale, you should reward her and then clone her. So much of my professional success and personal happiness derives from the fact that she was willing to tell me the truth, however ugly it might have been. The law school needs more like her.

"Lack of a filter" is not nearly as admirable or useful a quality as you and the many who celebrate it in the President have convinced yourselves.

"Hillbilly Elegy" by J.D. Vance is a memoir about growing up in a poor, rural area of Ohio and how it shaped his life and career. It's a powerful and moving story that has resonated with many readers.

One of the most infuriating parts of the last few weeks has been the garbage published about my friend Amy Chua. I just wrote a note to the Yale Law School dean defending Amy. Here's the meat of it, for those interested.

don't believe the worst of the charges against Amy—among them, that she told women that Judge Kavanaugh only hires women who look like models. I'm obviously biased, as this charge is an implicit criticism of women who, like my wife, clerked for Judge Kavanaugh and adore him. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale, and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook exam. I needed someone to tell me what YLS was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

I recently applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a clerk. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice, about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When I told Amy I wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." Amy may not be the most traditional of mentors, but if you want poor kids and other nontraditional students to succeed at Yale, you should reward her and then clone her. So much of my professional success and personal happiness derives from the fact that she was willing to tell me the truth, however ugly it might have been. The law school needs more like her.

One of the most infuriating parts of the last few weeks has been the garbage published about my friend Amy Chua. I just wrote a note to the Yale Law School dean defending Amy. Here's the meat of it, for those interested.

I don't believe the worst of the charges against Amy—among them, that she told women that Judge Kavanaugh only hires women who look like models. I'm obviously biased, as this charge is an implicit criticism of women who, like my wife, clerked for Judge Kavanaugh and adore him. But I don't believe them because I never heard her say anything like that, and neither did anyone else I know and speak to.

But there's something more pernicious at work in the criticism of Amy Chua. She is undoubtedly unfiltered. And I'm sure she sometimes phrases things in a way other people, most of all a law school dean, may not like. But her honesty—and, yes, her lack of a filter—are what make her so valuable to so many students. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale, and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook exam. I needed someone to tell me what YLJ was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

I nearly applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a clerk. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice, about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When I told Amy I wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." She then gave me perhaps the best piece of advice I have ever received, when she told me to focus instead on a girl I had recently started dating (we met in Amy's class). As you may know, that girl is now my wife, and we have a 15-month-old baby together.

What I'm getting at ultimately goes to questions of class and social capital. Amy may not be the most traditional of mentors, but if you want poor kids and other nontraditional students to succeed at Yale, you should reward her and then clone her. So much of my professional success and personal happiness derives from the fact that she was willing to tell me the truth, however ugly it might have been. The law school needs more like her.

I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale, and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook exam. I needed someone to tell me what YLJ was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

I nearly applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a clerk. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice, about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When I told Amy I wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." She then gave me perhaps the best piece of advice I have ever received, when she told me to focus instead on a girl I had recently started dating (we met in Amy's class). As you may know, that girl is now my wife, and we have a 15-month-old baby together.

What I'm getting at ultimately goes to questions of class and social capital. Amy may not be the most traditional of mentors, but if you want poor kids and other nontraditional students to succeed at Yale, you should reward her and then clone her. So much of my professional success and personal happiness derives from the fact that she was willing to tell me the truth, however ugly it might have been. The law school needs more like her.

One of the most infuriating parts of the last few weeks has been the garbage published about my friend Amy Chua. I just wrote a note to the Yale Law School dean defending Amy. Here's the meat of it, for those interested.

I don't believe the worst of the charges against Amy—among them, that she told women that Judge Kavanaugh only hires women who look like models. I'm obviously biased, as this charge is an implicit criticism of women who, like my wife, clerked for Judge Kavanaugh and adore him. But I don't believe them because I never heard her say anything like that, and neither did anyone else I know and speak to.

But there's something more pernicious at work in the criticism of Amy Chua. She is undoubtedly unfiltered. And I'm sure she sometimes phrases things in a way other people, most of all a law school dean, may not like. But her honesty—and, yes, her lack of a filter—are what make her so valuable to so many students. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale, and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. And I'm sure she sometimes phrases things in a way other people, most of all a law school dean, may not like. But her honesty—and, yes, her lack of a filter—are what make her so valuable to so many students. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale, and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook exam. I needed someone to tell me what YLS was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

I recently applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a clerk. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice, about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When I told Amy I wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." She then gave me perhaps the best piece of advice I have ever received, when she told me to focus instead on a girl I had recently started dating (we met in Amy's class). As you may know, that girl is now my wife, and we have a 15-month-old baby together.

What I'm getting at ultimately goes to questions of class and social capital. Amy may not be the most traditional of mentors, but if you want poor kids and other nontraditional students to succeed at Yale, you should reward her and then clone her. So much of my professional success and personal happiness derives from the fact that she was willing to tell me the truth, however ugly it might have been. The law school needs more like her.

One of the most infuriating parts of the last few weeks has been the garbage published about my friend Amy Chua. I just wrote a note to the Yale Law School dean defending Amy. Here's the meat of it, for those interested.

don't believe the worst of the charges against Amy—among them, that she told women that Judge Kavanaugh only hires women who look like models. I'm obviously biased, as this charge is an implicit criticism of women who, like my wife, clerked for Judge Kavanaugh and adore him. But I don't believe them because I never heard her say anything like that, and neither did anyone else I know and speak to.

But there's something more pernicious at work in the criticism of Amy Chua. She is undoubtedly unfettered. And I'm sure she sometimes phrases things in a way other people, most of all a law school dean, may not like. But her honesty—and, yes, her lack of a filter—are what make her so valuable to so many students. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale, and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook exam. I needed someone to tell me what YLS was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

I nearly applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a CL. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice, about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When I told Amy I wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." Το βιβλίο "Hillbilly Elegy" του J.D. Vance είναι ένα μνημείο της Βιογραφίας. Περιγράφει την ιστορία της οικογένειάς του, η οποία μετακόνησε από μια φτωχή περιοχή της Αμερικής στην elite της Yale Law School. Το βιβλίο είναι μια εξαιρετική μελέτη της κοινωνικής ανισότητας και της κληρονομιάς.

I nearly applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a clerk. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice, about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When I told Amy I wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." She then gave me perhaps the best piece of advice I have ever received, when she told me to focus instead on a girl I had recently started dating (we met in Amy's class). As you may know, that girl is now my wife, and we have a 15-month-old baby together.

What I'm getting at ultimately goes to questions of class and social capital. Amy may not be the most traditional of mentors, but if you want poor kids and other nontraditional students to succeed at Yale, you should reward her and then clone her. So much of my professional success and personal happiness derives from the fact that she was willing to tell me the truth, however ugly it might have been. The law school needs more like her.

One of the most infuriating parts of the last few weeks has been the garbage published about my friend Amy Chua. I just wrote a note to the Yale Law School dean defending Amy. Here's the meat of it, for those interested.

I don't believe the worst of the charges against Amy—among them, that she told women that Judge Kavanaugh only hires women who look like models. I'm obviously biased, as this charge is an implicit criticism of women who, like my wife, clerked for Judge Kavanaugh and adore him. But I don't believe them because I never heard her say anything like that, and neither did anyone else I know and speak to.

But there's something more pernicious at work in the criticism of Amy Chua. She is undoubtedly unfiltered. And I'm sure she sometimes phrases things in a way other people, most of all a law school dean, may not like. But her honesty—and, yes, her lack of a filter—are what make her so valuable to so many students. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale, and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook exam. I needed someone to tell me what YLJ was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

One of the most infuriating parts of the last few weeks has been the garbage published about my friend Amy Chua. I just wrote a note to the Yale Law School dean defending Amy. Here's the meat of it, for those interested.

don't believe the worst of the charges against Amy—among them, that she told women that Judge Kavanaugh only hires women who look like models. I'm obviously biased, as this charge is an implicit criticism of women who, like my wife, clerked for Judge Kavanaugh and adore him. But I don't believe them because I never heard her say anything like that, and neither did anyone else I know and speak to.

But there's something more pernicious at work in the criticism of Amy Chua. She is undoubtedly unfiltered. And I'm sure she sometimes phrases things in a way other people, most of all a few school deans, may not like. But her honesty--and, yes, her lack of a filter--are what make her so valuable to so many students. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale, and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook format. I needed someone to tell me what YLJ was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

recently applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a CL. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice, about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When told Amy wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." She then gave me perhaps the best piece of advice I have ever received, when she told me to focus instead on a girl I had recently started dating (we met in Amy's class). As you may know, that girl is now my wife, and we have a 15-month-old baby together.

What I'm getting at ultimately goes to questions of class and social capital. So much of my professional success and personal happiness derives from the fact that she was willing to tell me the truth—however ugly it might have been. The law school reads more like her.

I don't believe the worst of the charges against Amy—among them, that she told women that Judge Kavanaugh only hires women who look like models. I'm obviously biased, as this charge is an implicit criticism of women who, like my wife, clerked for Judge Kavanaugh and adore him. But I don't believe them because I never heard her say anything like that, and neither did anyone else I know and speak to.

But there's something more pernicious at work in the criticism of Amy Chua. She is undoubtedly unfiltered. And I'm sure she sometimes phrases things in a way other people, most of all a law school dean, may not like. But her honesty—and, yes, her lack of a filter—are what make her so valuable to so many students. I knew "nothing" about how to navigate Yale, and found its classrooms, social life, and expectations deeply confusing. When it came time to apply to the Yale Law Journal, I didn't need someone who would, for instance, give me advice on how to prepare for the bluebook exam. I needed someone to tell me what YLJ was, why people actually did it, why it was useful (or not), and how it fit with my own ambitions and interests. Amy did that. No one else gave advice like that. No one else was so honest.

I nearly applied to work for Judge Kozinski as a clerk. Given what I knew of his hiring practices and preferences, I suspect I would have gotten the job. Other professors gave me generic advice, about how to put together an application, what skills to highlight, and so forth. When I told Amy I wanted to apply, she looked at me like I had just taken a dump in her office. "Why would you ever do that? He is such a scumbag." She then gave me perhaps the best piece of advice I have ever received, when she told me to focus instead on a girl I had recently started dating (we met in Amy's class). As you may know, that girl is now my wife, and we have a 15-month-old baby together.

What I'm getting at ultimately goes to questions of class and social capital. Amy may not be the most traditional of mentors, but if you want poor kids and other nontraditional students to succeed at Yale, you should reward her and then clone her. So much of my professional success and personal happiness derives from the fact that she was willing to tell me the truth, however ugly it might have been. The law school needs more like her.

One of the most infuriating parts of the last few weeks has been the garbage published about my friend Amy Chua. I just wrote a note to the Yale Law School dean defending Amy. Here's the meat of it, for those interested.

Samosamo. I volunteered to get out the vote & knocked on a lot of doors. I can tell you Ohio Republicans have left many Ohioans out in the cold. Poor of the poorest and no light at the end.

Gerrymandered districts, low wages, poor industries & old infrastructures

Bad choice JD

What I find interesting, is that there are no tweets supporting DeWine in this thread, there is only disappointment that you support him. Most of your followers are liberals who thought your book will shed light on the phenomenon of Trumpism, only to find that you fell in line.

It's pretty disgusting to equate "American" with "white" given my writing and speaking on this topic, not to mention my biracial family and non-white son.

Zaid Jilani @ZaidJilani

Sometimes the people who insert race into every conversation simply think way more about race than their intended targets do. @JDVance1 isn't talking about skin color, he's talking about replacement level fertility, a pretty simply growth concept. twitter.com/joshuaciocv3r/s.

I was received into the Catholic Church yesterday. My dear friends Rod Dreher and Sam Rudman came for the occasion, and Rod transcribed this "interview" as I drove him to the airport. It was a really great day, but one thing occurs to me in reading this interview:

Rod Dreher @roddreher

It was a joy to be present when @JDVance1 received baptism and confirmation as a Catholic today. I talked to him about it here theamericanconservative.com/dreher/j-d-van.

I'm too concerned with the "intellectual" part of being Catholic. Not that ideas aren't important: they're very important, and part of my own individual path to Catholicism. But I believe the faith has to be lived, and felt, and that's one of the things I'll need to work on.

This is great. There's a lot of world class technology developed in Ohio (and the midwest more broadly) that languishes in academic institutions instead of turning into products that change people's lives. Hopefully this is the beginning of a new approach.

It cements my view that someone with Warren / Lind's mood affiliation is better to come out of the GOP, where they'd be free to buck identity politics and be honed in on any anti-market excesses.

I'm sure we can improve our approach to enforcement against such abuse. But I think very few people embrace a position as absurd or heartless as the one you describe. Suggesting it's the cause of the scourge probably doesn't get us closer to better enforcement.

Unless people are willing to do something meaningful to reduce demand for this content--which requires changing how we deal with online content platforms--these abuses will continue to accelerate. Confronting that fact squarely is a necessary part of better enforcement.

A good thread. I see a lot of politicians complaining about China's influence (mediated through corporate America). The next time my own party controls all three elected branches, we might consider doing something besides giving NBA owners tax breaks and then whining on twitter.

Matt Stoller @matthewstoller

1. What do monopolies have to do with China and the NBA? Plenty. Historically, there are important analogies on how China uses its economic power and how Germany did prior to WWII. I have a chapter in my upcoming book called "Trustbusters against Hitler" simonandschuster.com/books/Goliath/.

Cultural views are one thing, but you know that it's a myth that the GOP voting base is more "working class" than the Democrats'. HRC won more low-income voters than Trump did. The GOP is capitalizing on white grievance voters.

Blair Reeves @BlairReeves · 18m

It's probably very frustrating for many old-school conservatives that white grievance politics and corporate slockeyism are the only remaining animators of GOP policy, and you may wish to change that one day. Good luck, but I dunno how you'll do that in the Trumpian party.

And I am so so tired of the "decades of elite failure" trope on China. As if there was some clearly marked alternative path in which China would give us no worries or present no challenges. International affairs is a constant string of old solutions giving rise to new problems.

1) I think you're presenting a caricature of the elite failure hypothesis. 2) there were lots of people saying bad things would happen at the time. Lighthizer was raising hell about China in the late 1980s. That should cause some humility for people who misfired so badly.

J.D, do you think impeding China's growth ought to be a freestanding US policy goal? If it were then a trade deal would be self-defeating, no? Objective wouldn't be trade on different terms but less trade period. And if that's the objective, what's the limiting principle?

I didn't say it never worked. I'm saying that your argument--that we often win in the WTO--doesn't defeat Lighthizer's point. The WTO remedy can be useful without being an adequate remedy, which is what I take USTR's position to be.

My point was to draw a distinction between long term consequences, many unpredicted, and short term consequences, many predicted. You responded by noting a short term consequence that 1) concede is real; 2) argued was predictable; and 3) agree is bad

I don't think we necessarily need to "decouple" our economies. I'm a fan of the Cass/Atkinson view that we should probably be more worried about incubating the industries of tomorrow. But that probably requires some reshoring, for a host of reasons.

I'm not an economist, but I can spot a bad argument. And the argument--reproduced ad nauseum in the business press--that manufacturing jobs not keeping pace with output = automation is the main culprit is really bad. There are so many other variables at play.

Follow @hamandcheese and Oren for a lot of good arguments for why we need "more" automation in the economy--it increases productivity, keeps us ahead of China, and--hopefully--should raise wages over the long term.

This isn't always true, of course. Some third time funds want to raise a much larger fund, so they need new check writers. But this poses its own risk: there's a very good argument that venture simply doesn't scale, and that a good $100m fund will be an awful $400m fund

So, my guess is that one problem in venture is that institutional money is biased toward mediocre follow on funds. They're often getting access to the funds that no one should want access to. /finis

This is a solid summary of a pretty interesting and important report on the VC industry. Some obvious takeaways: most venture investors aren't very good, they make a lot of money off of fees but not performance, and the industry is pretty risk averse. 1/x

One of the less obvious takeaways is that most institutional investors invest in venture in precisely the wrong way: they are unwilling to back first time funds, and so they chase name brand funds that don't need their money. This chart is relevant:

There's a flip side to this dynamic, what I call "implicit adverse selection" Founders, Andreessen, et al. don't need new sources of capital, because they are good. So many third time funds willing to take capital from new investors are willing to do so because they "need" money.

This is OK, but voters in the heartland expect their leaders to have real policy solutions to their problems. So, might I suggest, "Let's elect someone #smart so that we can get back to the barn dance and give everyone a tax-deductible HSA."

Harvard Law Centrists @HLCentrists

After conducting further research on Real Americans (skimmed Hillbilly Elegy), we are piloting "Let's elect someone #smart so we can get back to the barn dance or shopping at Walmart!" Can someone who has met one of these people tell us if this is good?

Yes, summarizing that as something that is a benefit or "upside" borders on deranged, especially given fertility trends. (And the paper she references in the next paragraph is about the benefit of compensating people in the wake of divorce, so I don't get your point.)

The paper referenced in the next sentence claims that the legalization of divorce in Chile "raised" fertility among highly educated women

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 · Jan 5

I'm not sure if it raised fertility, though it claims to have raised first births. But two big caveats, as I read the paper: 1) the divorce law combined with a financial incentive, and the author treats those first birth effects as a consequence of the financial incentive; 1/x

There are also elements of this piece that border on sociopathic. "Easier access to divorce has been shown to reduce the number of births..." in a piece about the "upside" of divorce--yikes.

Wife, watching Joe Burrow: How do you think he'll like Cincinnati?

Me: Poor kid.

Wife: What?! Don't you like Cincinnati? You convinced me to move here.

Me: You don't have work behind the Bengals' offensive line. If you did, we would have moved somewhere else.

There's a lot I'm still grappling with. One of Lind's most interesting ideas is that working class institutions are most effective when given effective veto power (think unions in the economy; churches in the culture). As I say in the review, there's a lot of Leo XIII in here

I also think it's possible that the realignment Lind envisions doesn't happen on the Right. Maybe it doesn't happen at all. In which case things will be really chaotic and depressing in the coming decade.

I really like this @JDVance1 review of Lind's "The New Class War" at @theamgreatness but this line stuck in my craw:

"Social liberalism is the ideology of the managerial class because it serves their economic interests."

If your point is that the ideology isn't just about money, then point conceded. But it is often about that. Even climate change ("let's ban the main industry driving reduced emissions because its leaders aren't our donors") can be framed in economic terms.

The very idea of a rational consumer in healthcare is a myth.

The presence of a medical condition (even not urgent) is going to bias the choice. A common side effect of many diseases and conditions is reduced mental capacity.

I need to finish it. It's very insightful in its diagnosis of what's going on in the US —basically, arguing that our institutions have failed in their task of forming people. But I wonder how hopeful Yuval is that these problems can be cured.

First, the poll doesn't actually say that. Second, we're about to run an election of Bernie vs. Trump. Maybe it's worth asking what the conventional economic statistics might be missing.

Scott Winship @swinsh

So weird. Econ stats say we're better off than ever, and people tell pollsters the same (news.gallup.com/poll/284264/re...), yet Oren characterizes popular perception otherwise and thinks things are bad. How to explain this paradox??? twitter.com/oren_cass/stat...

Because you guys are debating the economics data (at least broadly defined), and I think it's an important topic? I am certainly skeptical of the "economics explains all" arguments and I understand Oren to agree. Doesn't mean those questions don't matter.

That's the thing, Mr. Vance. I wouldn't presume to speak for all Appalachians (and I wouldn't write about rust-belt culture, since I'm not from there.) And I damn sure would not insinuate that their poverty is because of some moral failing or defect in their character or culture

Two additions to Charles's analysis: 1) the despair part is still really important, given the rise in suicide and alcohol-related deaths over the last two decades; 2) the supply/synthetic focus of this can sometimes ignore a dynamic effect that I think is difficult to quantify.

Basically, users know how dangerous the synthetic drugs are, and they know it's basically impossible to safely mix into non-synthetic drugs. And still they use. There's something very, erm, despairing, about continuing to use something that is so astonishingly dangerous.

Right, but we know that despair is a risk factor, and that various disincentives do reduce addictive behavior. There's something depressing going on with the continued use of synthetic opioids, given that everyone now knows using street supply is like playing Russian roulette.

Right, but we know that despair is a risk factor, and that various disincentives do reduce addictive behavior. There's something depressing going on with the continued use of synthetic opioids, given that everyone now knows using street supply is like playing Russian roulette.

My 2.5 year old asked for a "rhino video" and I somehow found the Ace Ventura scene where Jim Carrey is birthed from the backside of the robot Rhinoceros. And now I'm pretty sure I have decades of intense psychotherapy ahead of us.

What the 2020 campaign showed is that progressives/socialists have basically no reach into the white working class or among black voters. Their agenda doesn't sell there and their language doesn't work. It's a lefty professional class movement for the professional class.

Exactly right. One piece of this is that the desire for real community that people like @Chris_arnade have documented is often expressed as a love of both local place and also of country. The culturally progressive language you hear at Bernie rallies can get pretty insane.

A political take I'd like to read: why Bernie has performed so poorly with white and black working class voters, but has done reasonably well with Latinos. Some of this is compositional (ie Bernie does well with the youth and Latinos are a younger demo). But that's not all of it.

My priors are not a lot of this is Bernie's cultural shift left to appease the people who didn't vote for him in 2016. But my intuition is that, while important, this isn't the whole story. Maybe it's just a question of org and focus.

The big uncertainty is how sensitive the toggle is between mobility and spread. This is confounded by any number of other variables, but the sense I get from Korea is that pretty substantial disruptions (not quite China-level mass quarantines) work.

We should be isolating the elderly. Just tell them all to STAY HOME for a month

It's easier IMO to sell society on this as first step. Schools keep going etc. We instruct everyone over 75 not to go out in public. Start there.

To state the obvious, the two big unknowns are 1) mortality rate (and relatedly, hospitalization rate) and 2) how easily it spreads. The argument of the piece above is that the data we have from other countries points in such wildly divergent directions that we just don't know.

I watch the Italy numbers obsessively, in an effort to gauge how effective their lockdown efforts have been. Hopefully, their numbers will flatten starting now. But as @ba.a.s notes here, there's some evidence Italy's "understating" how many are dying.

Warning an alarm that the general population alone 400 people die times the number who the Bergamo mayor virus.

Death tolls in Italy may actually be understated due to lack of testing.

There is now an apparent spike in all-cause mortality, with Yesterday's numbers, while horrendous, at least show deceleration. So that's good (with the obvious caveat above). But I'd be really interested to see all-cause mortality from the first week of March 2019 and March 2020.

I haven't seen any reporting to this effect out of Germany. Still pretty early there, so haven't followed it as closely, though.

I assume some causes of death, like auto accidents, are declining. But that is outweighed by the increase in deaths not just from COVID-19 but from people unable to get care for illnesses. Presumably many heart attacks and strokes are going untreated now.

Exactly. In a state of true health system stress, lots of people without the virus suffer.

Not clear. If Italy is not testing for C-19, how do we know that the deaths were caused by it?

We don't know, but a huge spike in mortality just as the crisis took off would at least suggest that COVID19 had some role to play--both indirectly through system stress and directly.

Possible, though, that some other disease or condition is at work.

Seems to me that until C-19 is confirmed for each death, those numbers should be marked with an asterisk.

Not sure who you're directing this at, but I think we should be putting a lot of resources into hydroxychloroquine. Impossible to "prove" that masks work for coronavirus at this early stage, but the flu study I tweeted about -combined with Japan's experience--is suggestive.

There was one French study of dubious quality and a bit of anecdotal info is all that I am aware of. U of MN is conducting a trial (Yay!) b/c maybe then we will have some ability to know to proceed with this. I support as much experimenting as possible right now.

Do we know if the data is skewed because less people are being tested as a result of the lockdown? This would apply only to number of cases - but are fewer people leaving their home to be tested now, thus artificially lowering the new case count?

I think you're misinterpreting the quote. The meaning is that if a person dies in a hospital (and that person has tested positive)--but also has another condition like asthma --that death is treated as a COVID death. That's not much different from many countries.

Correct. The most plausible interpretation (to me) of the story about Bergamo is that you're seeing both unreported direct deaths and a spike in indirect deaths caused by system stress.

I woke up with three economic thoughts/questions this morning one, in a hyperglobalized world, is it even possible to open things back up? We can't make Japan, China (still not fully up and running), and Western Europe open up. Our ability to prevent recession may be limited.

Two, our economy is so financialized that young people especially tend to have a super abstract perception of it. I'm a big fan of a massive stimulus right now. But eventually, you have to actually make goods and services and send them to people. Stimulus doesn't work forever.

Three, the way the economic side of this crisis manifests itself in the public commentary is heavily contingent on the fact that most of our elites work in the "knowledge economy." The costs of social distancing are much lower for me and most of the people reading this than most.

Opinion

The Road to Coronavirus Hell Was Paved by Evangelicals

Trump's response to the pandemic has been haunted by the science denialism of his ultraconservative religious allies.

By Katherine Stewart

Ms. Stewart is the author of "The Power Worshipers: Inside the Dangerous Rise of Religious Nationalism"

Not every pastor is behaving recklessly, of course, and not every churchgoer in these uncertain times is showing up for services without regard for the scientific evidence. Far from it. Yet none of the benign uses of religion this time of crisis have anything to do with it. Trump's expressed hope that the country could be "opened up and just raring to go by Easter." He could, of course, have said, "by mid-April." But Mr. Trump did not invoke Easter by accident, and many of his evangelical allies were pleased by his vision of packed churches all over our country."

A brief history of the post war conservative movement is that donors funded a bunch of institutions that persuaded people to understand conservatism in these terms. And the end result was the rise of China, the decimation of American families, and a lot of tax cuts for the rich.

Erick Erickson @WErickson

Just don't think we can ever define conservatism as "common good" because conservatism is about liberty and freedom of the individual. It is the support of the individual against the collective common good

I'm not even talking primarily about the policies. That's obviously a big part. But the effort to equate conservatism with garden-variety liberalism (and obsession with the individual)—to the point of rejecting the value of seeking a common good—has been bad in many ways.

I'd also argue that conservatism "on those terms" was a response to a number of huge challenges that existed at the time (Cold War, stagflation, etc). Did they give rise to new challenges? Yes, just as our response to today's challenges will give rise to new ones in turn.

Of course. Note I didn't say "sole cause." But as we've discussed, I think the rise of China is something the libertarian coalition enabled, and our lack of response is traceable to the lack of a strong conservative antibody in the body politic.

Pointing to a very brief period where Republicans never got close to power doesn't prove much. Henry Olsen has written about how Reagan's conservatism was much more Hamiltonian, which is funny because today's libertarians often label anything close to Hamilton "socialism"

1930s to 1980 isn't a short period. It was a long period, and one of the most important in our history because it had the New Deal and Great Society. The only thing keeping things in check even a little bit was a small bipartisan conservative coalition that barely held together

First, there's an important distinction between end products and components. Second, because pricing at the high end is primarily a function of a government monopoly (ie PTO), you can't waive away the loss of important generic drugs (especially antibiotics) because they're cheap.

If you look at the death rate increase over average ("excess deaths" in the medical terminology), the models are just as badly wrong, as mortality rate is generally down overall. They are just attributing a lot of non-virus deaths to the virus.

I don't read Italian, but the chart in the report seems to end in mid March, before the worst hit. My only argument is that we won't really know the true toll until we're a few months post crisis, when we can look at the all cause numbers.

I think it's the only reasonable way to read the tweet. On the other point, there has been a lot of interesting stuff coming out of think tanks. That isn't inconsistent with a view that the broad thrust of the post-war right is a donor funded fusionism that failed.

Seems like this is a 'messy data in bad correlations out' scenario. To your point there are big questions, IMO, about causation vs. correlation in a lot of these numbers. Asymptomatic people that have Covid-19 will die as will symptomatic people not yet diagnosed.

Yes. Especially true given how early we are (8,000 deaths out of 330mn). So we won't know for a while. The way the CDC projects flu deaths is by adjusting upwards after a bunch of data has come in. I imagine the death count will be very unclear for a while.

Yup! This all goes back to the lack of diagnostic capacity, I think. We just don't know - and should definitely not take what China says at face value. So given these two points, we needed to test and do it at scale like last month. Are we close? 🤔

First, there's an important distinction between end products and components. Second, because pricing at the high end is primarily a function of a government monopoly (ie PTO), you can't waive away the loss of important generic drugs (especially antibiotics) because they're cheap.

Finally, there's something a little weird about saying our pharmaceutical supply is fine while our greatest geopolitical foe is threatening to withhold critical components. The Chinese don't make idle threats. Maybe they know more than misinterpretations of Investopedia articles Strikes me as a plausible story for hospitalizations, at least partially. But the magnitude of the difference is really striking. Separately, the ICU numbers also off substantially. That's harder to shift with stricter screening, right?

If you look at the death rate increase over average ("excess deaths" in the medical terminology), the models are just as badly wrong, as mortality rate is generally down overall. They are just attributing a lot of non-virus deaths to the virus.

In other words, if all of this distancing--some forced by policy, some by organic behavior changes--drives down traffic fatalities, drug ODs, etc, that will drive down mortality in a way that has nothing to do with COVID. Presumably there are ways to adjust, but it's complicated.

Some states report very quickly. New York has very rapid death-reporting, which is very helpful. But you simply cannot take CDC's "100% complete" indicator to indicate that reporting is over. It just means normal mortality levels have been reached.

Saying, "well ACTUALLY this disease would have killed millions but we have modern medicine" is silly: the point is the disease was less disruptive than it might have been because we have medicine.

Likewise, if social distancing reduces deaths, then it was a less severe issue.

However, all cause deaths minus confirmed COVID deaths will show us approximately how much of the baseline is driven by social distancing. Especially since a major killer in this season is flu, and we get speedy flu reporting to use as a proxy for other-infectious-diseases.

Sure. But the search for some reliable real-time metric of how seriously we should take COVID is vain and will go nowhere. We will always be a farsighted person walking backwards into the future.

The best we can do is a 2-16 week lag. Which means we will definitely be stricter than normal for 2-16 weeks longer than is truly necessary.

But we really should not be taking as if normalcy is nearby. It is not. China is still far away from normal and they got hit much earlier. There's no speedy return to normal. This is a fatal fantasy and must be wrung from our brains.

Yeah, I'm not suggesting normalcy is nearby. If you look just at Ohio, service sector foot traffic was way down well before lockdowns started. Layer on top the demand shock and globalization components of the slowdown, and there's a lot of pain even after we control the virus.

I still can't believe we don't have widespread, randomized info to this effect. The limited data I have seen doesn't exactly inspire confidence--14 percent immunity in arguably the hardest hit region in the world. (Though maybe this particular town wasn't hit that hard.)

Philippe Lemoine @phi43

In this Lombardian town, 2,000 people (1/3 of the population) were tested and, according to this report, 13%-14% of the population has developed immunity for COVID-19. It would be great to have data on those people, especially their age, as well as on the people who died. twitter.com/KaplanBen_Fr/s.

1 11 0

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 · 1m

First, people are right to say the situation is fluid and it's tough to record every death accurately. But importantly, 1) this is true for every disease (do you think every flu death has a confirmed flu test? No, just check the CDC guidelines) and 2) miscounting goes both ways

1 11 0

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 · 1m

There's a lot of reason to think we're undercounting deaths. First, it has happened in nearly every major European country. NYC public health officials have argued that where normally 20-25 people die per day at home, that number has been higher than 200 as the crisis has peaked.

The phylogenetics we have suggest the virus sprang up in late November in Wuhan, and first moved to the United States in January. This is not a timeline consistent with widespread transmission by March. See here: medrxiv.org/content/10.1101

First, people are right to say the situation is fluid and it's tough to record every death accurately. But importantly, 1) this is true for every disease (do you think every flu death has a confirmed flu test? No, just check the CDC guidelines) and 2) miscounting goes both ways

There's a lot of reason to think we're undercounting deaths. First, it has happened in nearly every major European country. NYC public health officials have argued that where normally 20-25 people die per day at home, that number has been higher than 200 as the crisis has peaked.

Germany and South Korea are often cited. For some time, both had mortality rates below 1 percent (seasonal flu is .1 percent). But as the disease has progressed (COVID takes a long time to kill people) they've both seen their mortality rise to 1.8 percent (last time I checked).

Iceland is another case study for the optimists. Their mortality is currently .3 percent. But they've had very few cases (serology testing suggests about 6 percent of the country is infected) and active containment. It's always tough to draw conclusions from a small sample size.

It was late and so I'm sure I made mistakes. I'll try to correct them here. Someone pointed out that Iceland is doing PCR (not blood test for antibodies) testing. Given how rapidly they're testing I think those results are still informative, but should have been more clear.

From their official testing (1500ish out of 29k). Up to now, I had thought (and seen reported) that their testing was nearly all random.

Perhaps they're doing some random testing and some testing of the already-symptomatic, like we are.

You just dismissed a study of 9k people in Iceland because it was too small. Now you're citing a study of 1.2k people.

First, in Denmark, a place that's been hit reasonably hard, one serological test measured 1,000 people in the Copenhagen metro area, and another 244 in Central Denmark. 2.7 percent tested positive in Copenhagen. 0 percent tested positive in Central Denmark.

I agree we should always defer to “real expert analysis,” like that from the WHO and CDC that discouraged mask wearing despite the evidence. My goal was to give people a sense of the lower bound of possibilities (Iceland), and also the way that CFR has tended to increase.

IFR estimates are inherently more difficult. But given the paper you cited includes an estimate for Icelandic infection that is 70 percent higher the number suggested by randomized PCR, I'm not sure why I should take its conclusions as gospel.

I won't pretend to have read every IFR estimate. I have kept some tabs on CEBM. My sense is that it has tended to overstate total infection rate, and not totally adjusted as things have evolved. (Example, the Princess CFR is now at 1.2 or 1.4 last time I checked.)

Lower mortality?

Of all the people tested in this state (IN) as of 4/9, we are currently sitting at a 3.8% mortality rate for known positive cases

To state that it isn't very deadly or that it has a comparable or lower death rate than the flu, you need data.

JD has no data.

J.D. Vance @JDVance1

1. COVID is not very deadly, with comparable (or even lower) mortality than the flu
2. There's a good chance COVID has been here for a while, and is already widespread in the population, though asymptomatic in most cases.

As much as I found myself nodding in agreement with Helen's points, evidence grows that informal social distancing is both 1) economically devastating and 2) predated any lockdown. This is an interesting thread

Trevor Bedford @tryrb

In many ways, this should be entirely obvious, but we now have strong evidence that social distancing results in decreased #COVID19 transmission rates. 1/7

What's the counterexample. The UK? It theoretically pursued a herd immunity approach through mid-March, but in fact had radically altered course well before the government ordered a lockdown. Sweden? Swedes are following distancing protocols, and their economy is getting crushed.

Too many people assume a level of agency that may not exist. What if the decision isn't between economic devastation or health crisis? Or, more precisely, what if the decision was already made, by something far more powerful than human politics?

Are the Swedes economy getting crushed? The only article I can find estimates a 4% retraction. I can't help but think the US is much more than 4% What am I missing?

I haven't seen a recent projection. But 4 percent is substantial, and when that projection was made in late March (by Swedbank, I believe), US banks were projecting 3-4 percent. I am sure we'll contract more than that, but recent Swedish estimates may say the same.

If the argument is that there's a more effective (and practical) cocktail of responses, where you still get some economic damage, but you 1) don't get a full blown depression and 2) avoid a huge spike that induces a panic, which then affects the economy, I'm all ears.

One final point. I often disagree with Alex. Sometimes I really think he overstates things (we still don't have good all cause mortality figures for Europe for week 14, for instance). But one area of strong agreement: Many in the press screwed up reporting on the IHME model

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 · 1m

It was, at best, a clunky model for such a dynamic crisis. It claimed, from the very beginning, to incorporate "full social distancing" into its projections. Everyone: learn the purpose of these models or don't discuss them. A couple friends have gone full truther over that model

My whole point is that this economic damage was already happening. And I'd love to see the counterfactual. Sweden? They're definitely experiencing a severe recession, and maybe worse. Will they do better than the US, assuming they don't have another spike (big if)? Maybe?

I find the idea that you can lockdown the country until we "eradicate" the disease preposterous, in part because no Western country has seen anything close to exponential decay. But I don't understand how, if we stopped the lockdowns, we forestall major economic damage.

Figured I'd reply to this. Will be brief. Basically, on the mortality point, granted, though I don't know what we do with that besides pursuing different quarantine strategies for old and young. It's clearly just a nasty disease for those with symptoms, even if you don't die.

I maintain that when this is all over we'll realize how much "social distancing" was happening organically. If that holds then shutting down gardening stores will cause some real harm without ever accomplishing much on the public health side.

I haven't found a good English translation of the paper. Assuming it holds, would be both bad (lower community transition even in a hard hit area than we might hope) and good (lower mortality than worst estimates, though still far worse than seasonal flu).

Austrian study finds .32 percent of one sample with active infection. This suggests against broad exposure, but given that it's only testing active cases (not those who had it in the past), there are other plausible--however unlikely--interpretations.

Yes, though it was a small sample size (and I believe the death rate has risen to about 1.7 percent based on recent deaths). This would be close to a worst-case scenario if it held: you get herd immunity, but only if 2 percent of your population dies.

It is two of the larger hospitals in Stockholm only. But otherwise correctly understood. Rest of country likely less exposed (yet)

Main point is that models that assume people won't alter behavior during a pandemic are overly simplistic. Lockdowns/stay at home orders are probably better to get over some collective action problems but it's not like people will do nothing to alter behavior in a pandemic.

More evidence that COVID was not on the West Coast in November, December, or early January. At this point, I still haven't seen a single credible data point that COVID was widespread in the US before March.

There is a lot of Twitter chatter surrounding a rumor that circulation of #COVID19 in California in fall 2019 has resulted in herd immunity. This is empirically not the case. COVID-19 was first introduced into the USA in Jan/Feb 2020. 1/18

I think you mean IFR. If he's right that we're not detecting 90 percent of cases, IFR is .44 percent based on most recent death data. Because COVID kills slowly, that likely increases. Finally, we're also undercounting deaths, not just diagnosed cases, eg:

Germans established IFR of 0.3 on the basis of serological data. It cannot be increasing or decreasing - it is what it is. If his 20 times figure is true then it's literally like flu! Any undercounting of deaths is a rounding error compared to this stuff

@JDVance1

Follow

Replying to @giovaneio74 @DavidAFrench

They didn't establish that. One study found an IFR of .37 in a small town. Other studies have found .4. Others suggest it's much higher. And if NY, in the month of March, saw an excess of 4,000 to 4,500 deaths, that's far more than a rounding error when calculating IFR.

even if assume the outlandish assumption that the total death count should be increased by third as your NY example (and we also very well may be OVERcounting) suggests that's exactly a rounding error when you compare it with the 20-times augmentation of the denominator.

I'm not sure what's "outlandish" about looking at all cause mortality spikes to understand total mortality. That's a main factor in calculating mortality for other pandemics. I'm pretty sure a net increase of 4,000 deaths, in NYC, in the month ending April 4 is far more than 1/3.

Some evidence of broader transmission in NYC (Note this would be good news, more cases means lower mortality rate and more immunity)

Andy Biotech @AndyBiotech

Whoa! 29/210 (13.7%) of asymptomatic women admitted for delivery tested positive for the #coronavirus in NYC (3/29 developed fever later)

Big question is whether pregnant women (constantly in and out of hospital) inherently bias data. Also, given NYC infection rates, this is consistent with 10:1 or 15:1 ratio of unconfirmed to confirmed cases. Not the 100:1 I'd love to see.

Given the sample population (in the hospital unconfirmed to confirmed cases).

I think we'll see ~15% of NYC infected in first wave consistent with Lombardy. Not that helpful... we'd need 4 more similar waves to get to herd immunity. Since it also means higher R0 that means we need higher percentage (80%+) infected for herd immunity

Best research I see from dozens of sources suggest IFR between 0.4 - 1.2% even with world class medical response. Even at bottom end of that, there's no room for compacency. It's just too much death over a few months

I didn't realize the time series on the study. So it suggests more substantial undercounting (more on the order of 30x than 15x). Still not great but much better than 3 to 1.

A lot of confounding stuff. Undercounting of death. Deaths grow slowly over time. I wouldn't say this study makes me feel great especially considering the sample size, but it does suggest IFR not at the worst of the plausible range.

Certainly if the asymptomatic rate held at 9:1 or so, this would be important. But I took the study as trying to figure out how much presymptomatic spread they were seeing, not trying to answer whether those cases stayed asymptomatic. Would appreciate the authors weighing in

My operating assumption is that about half of COVID infections are "asymptomatic"-- meaning they don't feel anything or they're mild enough that it doesn't cross their mind. If it was more like 90 percent, that would be meaningful.

I'm more pessimistic. If we're missing 90 percent of cases, call it an IFR of 1:1. If we're missing 95 percent, call it north of 5. That's basically my guess range.

Agree, but the tests were conducted two to three weeks ago (late March, per the paper) - and the researchers make no reference to problems in the group at this point. And nationally we haven't seen evidence of major problems among homeless populations.

Perhaps they can weigh in

Certainly if the asymptomatic rate held at 9:1 or so, this would be important. But I took the study as trying to figure out how much presymptomatic spread they were seeing, not trying to answer whether those cases stayed asymptomatic. Would appreciate the authors weighing in.

Importantly, this wasn't a random collection of people off the streets. It was a group of people at a single shelter, living in close quarters. The fact that most are asymptomatic is definitely interesting, though you'd really want to see follow up data.

Speaking of all-cause mortality, the CDC reported just 10k deaths during the week ending April 10. The average U.S. weekly death rate is 50k+. Seems that shutdowns will do better against more frequent causes of death than C19

The CDC data trickles in over many weeks. Usually it's not complete for a few months after a given week. I would bet a lot of money that the all-cause numbers for April 10 will be much higher than 10k (and higher than 50k) when all the data comes in.

NYC is an outlier in a lot of ways, like ~30% of the deaths are under 65. I know it sounds crazy, but makes me wonder if the way people catch it in NYC is different, e.g., the initial viral load for many cases is higher because of prolonged close proximity like subway.

Mortality is tougher because of miscounting, and death rates tend to rise over time. But this would put FR much closer to seasonal flu, probably 2x to 3x the flu, not 10x (which has been my operating assumption)

We have no idea. Deaths are not counted as #COVID19 unless tests were given. Home deaths without testing are many times over last year. Even hospital deaths are pneumonia without a confirmed test. With 1% testing, it's not possible to extrapolate anything.

2 11 3

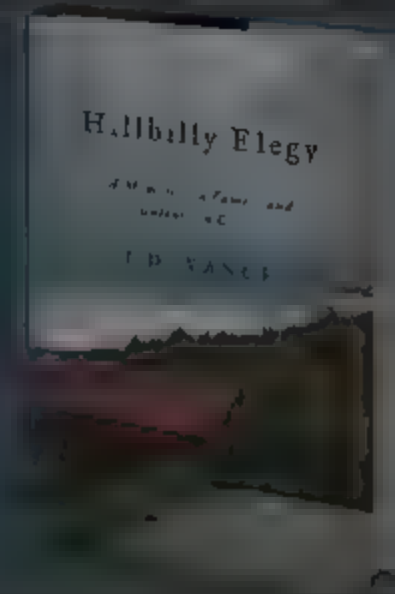

Kristy @KristyLasha · 19h

That's not true. CDC tells them to put COVID as cause of death if they even just "suspect" it.

Should COVID-19 be reported on the death certificate only with a confirmed test?

COVID-19 should be reported on the death certificate for all decedents where the disease caused or is assumed to have caused or contributed to death. Certifiers should include as much detail as possible based on their knowledge of the case, medical records, laboratory testing, etc. If the decedent had other chronic conditions such as COPD or asthma that may have also contributed, these conditions can be reported in Part II. (See attached Guidance for Certifying COVID-19 Deaths)

Importantly, this wasn't a random collection of people off the streets. It was a group of people at a single shelter, living in close quarters. The fact that most are asymptomatic is definitely interesting, though you'd really want to see follow up data.

The Boston team does not know for sure. Broadly, primarily, most persons testing positive without symptoms don't seem to be becoming very ill. The issue is untraceable spread to others who may, homeless or not. Boston has invested in stopping that - most cities have not.

This is an interesting observation, but it cuts in many directions. Elites are more likely to value "the economy" and to see their jobs as critical to their self-worth.

The problem is trying to separate the shelter-in-place orders from the obvious shifts in social behavior that predate the lockdowns. The lockdowns may have accelerated behavior shifts, but there's so much evidence that people had already substantially changed their behaviors.

If you actually speak with politicians, prospective and current, it's obvious how pernicious the influence of the donor class is. The same with nonprofit entrepreneurs on the Right. You want our money? Better toe the party line on trade, taxes, and immigration.

It's not "whining" to acknowledge this fact and try to persuade a few class traitors. Descriptively, I actually agree with Sam's point: it's not easy to encourage donors to shift. It may, in fact, be impossible to collect a critical mass. But it is necessary.

The political function of marriage is to separate the public from the private. In our modern way, the state from a distance acknowledges the legal constitution of family, & then protects family from what might damage it in society: Abandonment, adultery, &c.

But this private/public separation depends on the married couple's interest in their property & children, which is what they jeopardize should they make marriage schief

The modern state cannot compel people to get or stay married--something more is necessary--in short, religion.

By all means, publicize and discuss the Stanford serosurvey (I have). But if you're only pushing pieces of information that point in one direction, you're doing your audience a disservice. Here's just one criticism of that paper: med.umich.edu/@baldwin/peer

Good interview between @p_m_robinson and Dr Jay Bhattacharya, Professor of Medicine at Stanford. Based on the Santa Clara serosurvey, Professor Bhattacharya estimates the IFR of COVID-19 is 0.1 - 0.2%, not much worse than seasonal flu. bit.ly/3am1MJm

I'm not an expert and won't pretend to be, but in the interest of making specific predictions: the idea that COVID19 has an IFR below .2 percent, given what we know, is preposterous. That was a reasonable proposition two weeks ago. No longer.

It's tricky because the IFR isn't fixed and people often debate it as if it is. For instance, the IFR will fall as doctors work out what treatments are the most effective. But others share the views of the Stanford team. The CEBM estimates IFR at 0.1-0.36.

There are obvious complications here. The SF Bay Area doesn't totally fit, but I do wonder if it's directionally correct.

Also, that withdrawal can beneficially stop the spread over time. I'm not making a crude populist claim here. Just stating the obvious: that once the seeds are planted, some groups of people are better positioned to steer clear of the fallout.

I really think that in two years, we'll realize how little our various interventions mattered that much, both economically and in the spread of the disease. The band of outcomes is much narrower than we mortals presume. At least in the short term.

Suzana Black @suzana - May 1

It was horrible at eg Emhurst Hospital. A couple of other places. But overall, the hospitals weren't "quite" as swamped as they thought they'd be. Who knows what'll happen when/as we reopen, but as awful as it has been in NYC it could have been a lot worse.

The flip side of this, of course, is that any return to "normalcy" would be driven more by a reduction in fear/fatigue over being stuck at home, rather than lifting any lockdown. Which is why the idea that we can just turn the economy back on again seems so implausible to me.

As everyone who's followed this closely knows, a shockingly large share of the COVID dead (30 to >50 percent depending on location) died in nursing homes. A stinging indictment of the modern Western approach to warehousing our elderly.

I am often asked what about my family's Appalachian culture I'm most proud of. I instinctively say "loyalty." But as I age, I think more and more about how we all did everything we could to keep our elderly in the homes of their kin. Didn't always succeed, but we did pretty well.

The author beautifully and accurately frames the issue. But shouldn't the solution be a personal or negotiated choice among individuals, not a blanket gov't imposed rule? I think we should err on the side of voluntary self-isolation.

At least in the US, there's a pretty consistent trend in the geolocation data (adjusting for municipal rules and lockdown dates) that shows relatively consistent behavior across many legal regimes. SafeGraph has good info on this.

I have seen a lot of people claim that both 1) ending the lockdowns won't help the economy and 2) the lockdowns were very important for public health. Holding both of these views at the same time requires, at best, some mental gymnastics.

Contra these claims, I have not seen many credible public health folks.

I remember two months ago saying the IHME model was garbage. I was of course pilloried for rendering a judgment without expertise. My core argument was that it overestimated death on the way up and underestimated it on the way down. I have been proven right in both directions.

The people who treated that model as some Platonic truth were wrong, and their repeated failures to show humility have created real mistrust in public authorities. We should all be wearing masks in public (indoor) spaces, but I understand why many mistrust that guidance.

Everyone has gotten something wrong about COVID, me included. I'm sure I'll get more wrong in the future. But a little humility would go a long way. By all means, make predictions about the future, but be honest about the uncertainty and admit when you're wrong. /rant Appreciate that. But I haven't seen any evidence that Italy's approach to family (rather than their demographics, stressed health care system, and most importantly, the fact that they were seeded early) is the driving factor behind their outbreak.

Case fatality rates as of March 15 are positively correlated with share of middle aged living with parents.

A demographer friend of mine, whose work isn't published yet, confirmed this using micro data.

Then, you add in other coronary problems, strokes, and other emergency treatments. I don't have data on the full mortality risks, but about 1.4 million people are admitted to English hospitals each year b/c of heart and circulatory problems. Delaying care could have big impact

Sure, I'm not doubting there are serious consequences to the foregone health care. I'm just doubting that it would manifest itself in 20,000 extra deaths in such a small period of time. I'd like to see the geographic distribution, like this:

One interesting question is, "Do lockdowns cause non-COVID deaths to increase?"

It's a hard question to answer since lockdowns are often endogenous to epidemics.

Why isn't a natural conclusion that a lot of the excess mortality is under-diagnosis (the article, if not the headline, does contemplate this)? I do suspect the healthcare shutdown will have a lot of costs, but you'd expect those costs to show up over the long term...

(missed cancer screenings for instance). 20,000 excess deaths during such a short period seems, intuitively, seems hard to chalk up to missed health care. How many deaths in an average month are actually preventable with adequate care? Genuinely asking.

Deaths related to sepsis that one tries to manage at home, chest pain that may be a heart attack, or a clot in the lungs won't take long to show up ..

At least in the US, there's a pretty consistent trend in the geolocation data (adjusting for municipal rules and lockdown dates) that shows relatively consistent behavior across many legal regimes. SafeGraph has good info on this.

I have seen a lot of people claim that both 1) ending the lockdowns won't help the economy and 2) the lockdowns were very important for public health. Holding both of these views at the same time requires, at best, some mental gymnastics.

People just say that it's because it didn't model voluntary social distancing and move on saying "nothing to see here". But again this is demonstrably not the reason, since it's still wildly off the mark even when you include voluntary social distancing in the scenario. 5/r

One possibility: spread is super sensitive to different types of social distancing, and the curve decays in a non-linear way with the introduction of certain types of measures. Which isn't a disagreement as much as an explanation for what you're observing.

To say "social distancing works" in a model sense means that transmission by fomites is weak and the virus needs sustained contact. That's enough to drop R0 from 2.5-3.5 to R0=1 but why would the models know that without the data necessary to build it in?

There's plenty of probabilistic reasoning in what I said. This is a random person w/ no background. A person taken at random will most likely not be able to do this correctly. It goes against other more established and better understood models. So, it's prob not true.

A friend in Minnesota just texted me this:

Please get on your knees. This is horrifying in MN. Banks on fire. Post office in flames. Gas station on fire. There is a home for expectant mothers with young children directly across the street from one of the buildings on fire.

That 80 percent figure appears to be a big overstatement. Not sure where the MN governor is getting that number. (Still I find it totally bizarre that anyone would drive to another state/neighborhood to riot.)

Dear God. Imagine the depravity required to set an occupied multi-family housing complex on fire and then trying to block fire engines from reaching the scene.

"Inside that home was a child."

"Protesters intentionally set a fire to an occupied building on Broad Street. This is not the only occupied building that has been set fire to over the last two days. But they prohibited us from getting on scene," Smith said. "We had to force our way to make a clear path for the fire department. Protestors intercepted that fire apparatus several blocks away with vehicles and blocked that fire department's access to the structure fire. Inside that home was a child."

Smith's voice filled with emotion as he recounted the event during a Sunday morning press conference.

"Officers were able to help those people out of the house. We were able to get the fire department there safely," he said before pausing to regain his composure. "When you take a legitimate issue and hijack it for unknown reasons, that is unacceptable to me. It's unacceptable to the Richmond Police Department and unacceptable to the City of Richmond."

2. There's a good chance COVID has been here for a while, and is a ready widespread in the population, though asymptomatic in most cases.

"Hillbilly Elegy" is a non-fiction book by J.D. Vance. It is a memoir about his family and his childhood in a poor, rural area of Ohio. The book is a bestseller and has been adapted into a TV series.

I continue to take it seriously, though I think there's basically no evidence of significant outdoor transmission. I've been very skeptical of all the "this will cause COVID to spike" hysteria from the press. But if these protests/riots don't cause a spike, I'll be surprised.

I follow a lot of epidemiologists on here. I'm sure many in the medical community still take it seriously (and didn't say otherwise), but it's notable how much the tone has shifted in response to these protests.

I guess we all have blind spots or feel obligated from time to time to attach ourselves to things that contradict our better judgement. The medical community is not where I'd start when looking to blame for a lack of seriousness on covid.

How many people you follow are actually involved? I've seen a number of reminders on staying masked (which the majority of protestors - the vast majority of which are not breaking anything - are), avoiding indoor gatherings, etc.

Frankly, runners are worse.

I'm still amazed at how quickly the moral scolding ceased as soon as elite-favored protests began taking place (I guess I shouldn't be amazed anymore. I should just expect it.) But it has further eroded trust in our country's experts.

You're just making a category error. I have been very explicit that behavior X (reopenings of the Georgia variety) is unlikely to cause a spike, because of informal behavioral shifts, or their absence. I'm making a prediction that behavior Y (protests/riots) will.

Actually, in re-reading my tweet, I realize I wasn't clear. As I mean is that I personally (and I've been pretty on the record) have not expected certain types of reopenings to cause a spike. But this time seems different.

I'm hardly confident. But best to put a public marker down so I can say, "I was wrong" if you don't see a spike by late June.

Two points. One, you must have been living under a rock the last three months. There's an entire meme ("Karen.") about the scolds. Two, you're drawing a distinction—between social pressure and legal pressure—that doesn't make sense because most people followed rules

For example, many churches are opening despite guidelines to the contrary. This is because many think they're constitutionally able to. Their earlier refusal was a good faith effort to follow rules. Criticizing churches but not large protests makes people think things are unfair.

TL;DR--I'm right. A lot of people were trying to be good citizens and radically altered behaviors, well before they were "made to"--though again, that distinction here is messy. Talk to health care professionals. Many procedures delayed (some by law, many by social avoidance)

The idea that people listening to the guidelines of authorities wasn't a big (though certainly not the only) driver of behavioral shifts is simply preposterous. And I predict that people will be more likely to ignore the rules--legal and otherwise--because of the present moment

Alternatively, say the protests are OK because your cause is just. But in a country of 330 million people, many will have their own causes for violating guidelines. And you can't just tell them, "well, YOU have to follow the rules because your 'worthy' causes are stupid and bad"

1. COVID is not very deadly, with comparable (or even lower) mortality than the flu.
2. There's a good chance COVID has been here for a while, and is a ready widespread in the population, though asymptomatic in most cases.

"Hillbilly Elegy" is a non-fiction book by J.D. Vance, a memoir about his family and his childhood in a poor, rural area of Ohio. The book is a bestseller and has been adapted into a TV series.

Here's the offending piece, though I'm not sure how long they'll keep it up given that its very existence reinforces structures of patriarchal hegemony and cultural

Many people--out of a respect for social distancing--missed a parent's dying hours. If you think experiencing that--while watching mass gatherings praised by the same scolds who prevented you from seeing family--doesn't erode trust in authorities, you're actually an idiot.

Andrew, I like you, but please leave the condescending fake respect out of this. Can you seriously not remember people getting scolded for outdoor activities? And do you think there's no risk to standing in crowded groups and speaking loudly?

Many people--out of a respect for social distancing--missed a parent's dying hours. If you think experiencing that--while watching mass gatherings praised by the same scolds who prevented you from seeing family--doesn't erode trust in authorities, you're actually an idiot.

Many people--out of a respect for social distancing--missed a parent's dying hours. If you think experiencing that--while watching mass gatherings praised by the same scolds who prevented you from seeing family--doesn't erode trust in authorities, you're actually an idiot.

Andrew, I like you, but please leave the condescending fake respect out of this. Can you seriously not remember people getting scolded for outdoor activities? And do you think there's no risk to standing in crowded groups and speaking loudly?

1. COVID is not very deadly, with comparable (or even lower) mortality than the flu.
2. There's a good chance COVID has been here for a while, and is a ready widespread in the population, though asymptomatic in most cases.

Yes, I fear that the goalposts have moved to "lock down what we want as long as we want." Schools here in Washington State have already signaled they will not reopen until there is a vaccine (Very earnest voice): it's just not safe enough to re-open universities, especially public health departments. We'll need to shut them down, and given the economic crisis, divert their salaries to the needy.

Yes, and according to our models, there is a particularly high COVID risk at the New York Times, we have to shut it down for a few months to protect lives.

Not sure aping particulars of Trump's style gets to Trumpianism. He really did move toward the center on issues of public spending and has hurt himself when he moved toward pre-Trump economic orthodoxy.

That tells us something about the popularity of that agenda.

That tells us something about the popularity of that agenda.

Trump's economic message consisted, in part, on promising just about everything to just about everybody

A conventional politician who tried to copy those promises would likely be laughed out of the room.

That makes replicating his appeal very difficult.

Two, in terms of effect on our political economy, Citizens United is much more important than every single one of those opinions (besides maybe NFIB, which is complicated.)

How often does Cato win in the Court?
Compare that to social conservative causes.
How often are socially conservative cases not even brought because there isn't a funding apparatus to support those cases?
How about Citizens United? This "what libertarianism" argument is bonkers.

You're going back and forth between the conservative legal movement and the behavior of judges. The movement has been equally supportive of social conservative causes as it has truly libertarian causes. Neither has gotten all that much from the courts.

They're related. But my argument is about the thrust of the legal movement. It's not just (or even primarily) judges. It's the institutions, funding, etc. And we just disagree that neither has gotten that much. Anyways, off to spend time with kids. My best to you.

The Supreme Court is necessarily pro-business because it enforces federal prerogatives over states' attempts to extract wealth from other states at the expense of national commerce. See Greve's writings. Given this fact, it's far from achieving its intended role

Here's data from four different cities.
Four different reopening regimes. Four

a big spike starting in early June. The confidence that protests haven't contributed to the spread of COVID is premature, and stupid.

Two quick responses, @ThePlumLineGS. 1 The argument in the piece you linked was about an alignment of conservatism and the working class, I didn't say anything about which party will embody that (nor do I really care which it is) Historically, it was the Democratic Party.

Greg Sargent @ThePlumLineGS

Any thoughts on @JoeBiden's new industrial policy plan, @JDVance1 and @PatrickDeneen? Why are the neoliberal elites and the woke progressives far more willing to use government power this way than Trump, the paragon of "conservative populism"? twitter.com/ThePlumLineGS/

Agree. A related point: Trump is weakest where he has embraced traditional establishment economic policy (tax reform especially). And it's telling that the most pro-life constituency among the Dems are its working class voters.

I've heard politicians sometimes fail to enact (or even care about) the policies they ran on. But if Biden wins and tries to rebuild our industrial base, I'll be happy even if he's not on my side of the aisle.

Trump's coronavirus fiasco and his embrace of GOP plutocracy have exposed his fraudulent "populism." Biden has a new plan to rebuild US manufacturing that exposes this fraud. What will "conservative populists" say about this gaping contrast now? New piece

There is suspicion/evidence that up to 80% of the population is innately immune. Add that to immunity from the first wave in NYC and it's not hard to imagine NYC had something near herd immunity.

The new waves (TX, AZ) are in areas that haven't experienced large waves yet.

Skepticism about the lockdowns is of course largely merited and right for conservatives to voice, but it should be mixed with articulating an approach to enjoying mostly just hanging out with your own family which all in all is a pretty traditional American approach to life.

Yes, @JoeBiden, families w/ young children need help. But No, not a child care tax credit that only benefits parents who put their kids in childcare. Let parents decide how best to care for their kids & don't exclude parents who stay home w/ their kids from your plan.

For parents of younger children, he proposed an $8,000 child care tax credit per child, up to $16,000, for families earning less than $125,000. It would be refundable so parents who did not pay much in taxes could still collect it. Or families earning less than 1.5 times

To state the obvious, the two big unknowns are 1) mortality rate (and relatedly, hospitalization rate) and 2) how easily it spreads. The argument of the piece above is that the data we have from other countries points in such wildly divergent directions that we just don't know.

Though, importantly, they are also losing years off of their life expectancy. If you're dying younger, you need less money. It's just math.

Well, that does fit with the report's argument that the real cause here is that lower-income and less-educated Americans have become so "affluent" and "have the luxury of taking their basic material needs for granted."

Plus there is the happiness they derive from watching their favorite President continue to vex their enemies. That alone is worth 5 years of LE and $20,000 per year

Wait, the younger generation has lower life expectancy? or vice versa?

This, from @phl43, is one of the smartest things I've read about coronavirus. Warning, it will satisfy neither the "it's just the flu" crowd nor the "Imperial College model is Gospel" crowd:

To state the obvious, the two big unknowns are 1) mortality rate (and relatedly, hospitalization rate) and 2) how easily it spreads. The argument of the piece above is that the data we have from other countries points in such wildly divergent directions that we just don't know.

Importantly, uncertainty doesn't mean we should be doing nothing. I'm supportive of various efforts to encourage "social distancing," though I do worry that they're not politically tenable for more than a few weeks. Eventually, people will get really pissed.

1. COVID is not very deadly, with comparable (or even lower) mortality than the flu
2. There's a good chance COVID has been here for a while, and is already widespread in the population, though asymptomatic in most cases.

1. COVID is not very deadly, with comparable (or even lower) mortality than the flu.
2. There's a good chance COVID has been here for a while, and is already widespread in the population, though asymptomatic in most cases.

Lauren, where in my entire book did I claim to use "bootstraps"? I am quite sure the word doesn't exist in the book, and equally certain that I explicitly criticize the view you assign to me. Here's a passage from the actual book I wrote:

There were many thumbs put on my scale. When I look back at my life, what jumps out is how many variables had to fall in place in order to give me a chance. There was my grandparents' constant presence, even when my mother and stepfather moved far away in an effort to shut them out. Despite the revolving door of would-be father figures, I was often surrounded by caring and kind men. Even with her faults, Mom instilled in me a life-long love of education and learning. My sister always protected me, even after I'd physically outgrown her. Dan and Aunt Wee opened their home when I was too afraid to ask. Long before that, they were the first real exemplars of a happy and loving marriage. There were teachers, distant relatives, and friends.

Remove any of these people from the equation, and I'm probably screwed. Other people who have overcome the odds cite the

Here's data from four different cities.
Four different reopening regimes. Four different climates. They all curiously saw a big spike starting in early June. The confidence that protests haven't contributed to the spread of COVID is premature, and stupid.

First, people are right to say the situation is fluid and it's tough to record every death accurately. But importantly, 1) this is true for every disease (do you think every flu death has a confirmed flu test? No, just check the CDC guidelines) and 2) miscounting goes both ways

13 46 414

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 Seuraa

There's a lot of reason to think we're undercounting deaths. First, it has happened in nearly every major European country. NYC public health officials have argued that where normally 20-25 people die per day at home, that number has been higher than 200 as the crisis has peaked.

But the truth is that we won't know until we can look at the all cause mortality numbers, and see how they've spiked or not in response to COVID. (To be clear I have some qualms with how useful the all cause numbers will be here, but they're probably the best we'll have.)

To state the obvious, the two big unknowns are 1) mortality rate (and relatedly, hospitalization rate) and 2) how easily it spreads. The argument of the piece above is that the data we have from other countries points in such wildly divergent directions that we just don't know.

Importantly, uncertainty doesn't mean we should be doing nothing. I'm supportive of various efforts to encourage "social distancing," though I do worry that they're not politically tenable for more than a few weeks. Eventually, people will get really pissed.

It is one thing to recognize that people have hard lives, often through no fault of their own. It's different entirely to treat them like children with no agency. Oliver's grandfather reminds me of my Mamaw.

To state the obvious, the two big unknowns are 1) mortality rate (and relatedly, hospitalization rate) and 2) how easily it spreads. The argument of the piece above is that the data we have from other countries points in such wildly divergent directions that we just don't know.

Importantly, uncertainty doesn't mean we should be doing nothing. I'm supportive of various efforts to encourage "social distancing," though I do worry that they're not politically tenable for more than a few weeks. Eventually, people will get really pissed.

1. COVID is not very deadly, with comparable (or even lower) mortality than the flu.
2. There's a good chance COVID has been here for a while, and is a ready widespread in the population, though asymptomatic in most cases.

"Hillbilly Elegy" is a non-fiction book by J.D. Vance, a memoir about his childhood in a poor, white, working-class family in the Rust Belt. The book is a bestseller and has been adapted into a film.

A brief history of the post war conservative movement is that donors funded a bunch of institutions that persuaded people to understand conservatism in these terms. And the end result was the rise of China, the decimation of American families, and a lot of tax cuts for the rich.

I'm not even talking primarily about the policies. That's obviously a big part. But the effort to equate conservatism with garden-variety liberalism (and obsession with the individual)—to the point of rejecting the value of seeking a common good—has been bad in many ways.

Directionally, I agree that policymakers have largely failed to reckon with the secondary consequences of the pandemic and the response to it. Best illustration is Biden's "I would shut it down; I would listen to the scientists" comment about a potential resurgence.

Epidemiologists have expertise in disease spread (though as we saw with their response to the protests, even that can get politicized), but they have no special ability to weigh the social, economic, and other costs. We can't outsource all cost-benefit calculus to scientists.

One quibble: I continue to think we overstate the economic costs of a lot of these policies (and their benefits, too). A lot of the response to the pandemic is informal and independent of the policies in place. It's not like Sweden (no lockdown) has avoided economic pain.

It's useful to distinguish libertarian attitudes ("folk libertarianism") from think tank policy agendas. Trump ran explicitly against 1) free trade, 2) immigration dovishness; and 3) entitlement reform. Interestingly, all issues that unite neocon and libertarian policy shops.

The most "fake" thing I can think of in terms of corporate taxes is accounting losses based on goodwill depreciations but I don't think there's an easy solution. And corporations are reluctant to do it because they don't like to show a GAAP loss.

Michael Brown @mdavidbrown 14m

But again, like carried losses, even with depreciation you ultimately have to pay the piper. When you sell the property, your basis is vastly diminished, so you pay higher capital gains tax. The hitch is that the owner arguably gets to choose what taxes to pay and when.

Is it true that you always have to pay the piper? Between various trust forms and tax-avoidance transactions (the old sale and leaseback stuff, even more complicated now), it seems like there are ways of creating phantom loss that aren't strictly "illegal"

Random gripe I remember this when I was in bootcamp, and I certainly feel it now that my niece is in basic for the AF (she's a great kid): military addresses are bullshit. There is no way in God's green earth that you need 47 lines of text to get a letter to people.

I would share her address if not for obvious privacy concerns. But I honestly can't believe how long it is. Every time I write her a letter, it's 50 percent writing, 25 percent writing the address, and 25 percent whining about writing the address.

Jennifer Rubin: let's injure thousands of Americans in dumb wars and then defund an institution that helps make them well.

Jennifer 'Vote Early' Rubin @JRubinBlogger

Congress might want to defund Walter Reed. It is a public health hazard.

Random gripe: I remember this when I was in bootcamp, and I certainly feel it now that my niece is in basic for the AF (she's a great kid): military addresses are bullshit. There is no way in God's green earth that you need 47 lines of text to get a letter to people.

I would share her address if not for obvious privacy concerns. But I honestly can't believe how long it is. Every time I write her a letter, it's 50 percent writing, 25 percent writing the address, and 25 percent whining about writing the address.

A brief history of the post war conservative movement is that donors funded a bunch of institutions that persuaded people to understand conservatism in these terms. And the end result was the rise of China, the decimation of American families, and a lot of tax cuts for the rich.

Neither one is doing particularly much to slow the spread right now, so it's spreading. The uptick is coming faster in Belgium because the people are generally less careful since they had a much longer "calm" period over the past few months.

To answer this Q and be more specific: the credible theory I'd heard re: Sweden was something approaching herd immunity. But Belgium was hit harder, and is now seeing a bad outbreak (Sweden is doing much better)

People giving population density answers are doing the calculation wrong. The denominator isn't the landmass of Sweden because most of the population is in a few cities. Alternative though is avg household size. Many Swedes live alone & transmission w/in household is very common

The household size thing seems to be really important. I understand (and obviously do it myself) the desire to extrapolate from Sweden, but it's probably of limited utility.

A brief history of the post war conservative movement is that donors funded a bunch of institutions that persuaded people to understand conservatism in these terms. And the end result was the rise of China, the decimation of American families, and a lot of tax cuts for the rich.

This cultural leveling is observably true, in my experience, but probably doesn't hold for the CEO who is thriving after (and because) they took advantage of massive labor arbitrage opportunities overseas, and their workers. Lordstown probably has a different dynamic from Altoona

So, yes, the agreement with China can work. It can also fail miserably. It is risky.

By the way, just looking at natural increase doesn't totally remove the effect of immigration, since births include natural-born descendants of immigrants and therefore natural increase would have been lower had it not been for past immigration

1 2 28

Philippe Lemoine @phi43 · 1 Std

But the point is that, with population momentum, you don't even need immigration for the population to increase for a while with below-replacement fertility. It's just that the age structure changes, i.e. the population gets older

3 2 28

Philippe Lemoine @phi43 · 1 Std

Moreover, sooner or later, below-replacement fertility catches up with you and the population starts going down. Clearly, only a white nationalist could worry about any of that, so by all means let's just cancel @JDVance1 for talking about below-replacement fertility 🙄

Like a lot of people on here, I'm watching this obsessively. Seems like the most important question is whether Florida is an outlier in terms of polling bias--if it's not, Trump is likely to actually pull this out.

Between 2016, 2018, and 2020, it's actually surprising how consistently the polls have missed Florida, and in the same direction. It's not like they're all over the place!

My concern is as no one seems to want to build homes anymore that we are just seeing a blow out in housing prices even allowing for a Covid correction. One of the major barriers to younger people getting married is that they will never be able to afford their own home.

I don't think we're properly weighting costs to children of some pandemic strategies. Last week my wife had the kids out buying shoes. A woman & her preschool-aged daughter walked in. She said it was the first time the girl had seen other children in many months. This is madness.

Oh, but it's a catechesis in sacrifice and solidarity, one might say. Maybe we can say that about mask-ing (within reason) or giving up some field trips, but denying children the irreplaceable joy of other children—fellow human beings—is something different.

1 2 20

Brandon McGinley @brandonmcg · 1 Std.

It's a catechesis in fear, a catechesis in catastrophizing. It teaches children that the goodness of other people and indeed of the whole world is contingent on risk, and that risk minimization is worth any price. It teaches that the first principle of the world is danger.

3 1 24

Brandon McGinley @brandonmcg · 1 Std.

While there is a paradoxical solidarity in isolation during a pandemic, we can take it too far. The mania for sterility is a mortal enemy of solidarity. Solidarity requires risk, vulnerability, presence. It requires us to see communion as a risk.

I've seen "Hillbilly Elegy." Amy Adams and Glenn Close are both terrific. The movie is a well-told family drama. The reason the critics are crapping all over it is simple: the book was treated as humanizing "Trump supporters," and is now a Bad Book™. So the movie is also Bad™.

I'm glad the film makes you feel closer to your family. I really am. But Vance really "punched down" in his book. Instead of looking upon folks with empathy, he blamed them alone for their poverty and drug abuse. I approached the book objectively. I was infuriated by the end.

My claims are based on the words you wrote. You were disrespectful to other poor folks. You resented their lack of ambition. But you had your grandparents. They valued education, and had some money. That saved you. You show little empathy for folks who didn't have what you had.

I certainly express frustration in the book towards some (including, importantly, with myself). But I explicitly acknowledge the importance of my grandparents, how their love saved me, and the fact that many people didn't have that. Have a nice night.

As an adamantly anti-trump and 7 generation rural resident I enjoyed your book
& the movie even if I don't agree with your politics. It was an excellent portrayal of intergenerational rural struggle and issues. Thank you for writing, we need more cultural understanding not less.

2 1 25

Elvio De la Cruz @LVO DLC · 22 Std

I haven't seen the film. I've been on the fence bc of Vance's tight rope act as a so-called conservative and a Trump apologist. I was interested in his story. Are the critics acting in bad faith? being biased? dishonest?

2 1

okay then @tiger then · 18 Std

It's a good book and film. Some on the left don't want to admit that rural intergenerational poverty is real & worsening. While it humanizes and explains people that feel marginalized and why Trump has appeal, I think many critics are in a bubble & choose not to understand.

It wasn't as good as the book, but it's clear that your life experience is something that doesn't enter into the worldview of many of the critics. Also the case that the Appalachian community is still regarded by many as a den of "deplorables", hence unworthy of sympathy.

1 5 4

Marshall Auerback @Mauerback · 18 Min

FWIW, don't think the film (or book) represented a simplistic paean of praise to conservative ideas. Personal responsibility is important, but the scenes documenting your mother's challenges powerfully illustrated profound structural failings in the provision of US healthcare.

Just watched @JDVance1's "Hillbilly Elegy." Coming from an Ohio family with some sad similarities I know this film touches nerves by portraying realities of addiction and poverty that remain a big problem today. Definitely watch this on Netflix. #Lma #Stellbenvi

I'm a lifelong Democrat, and this take is simply wrong. I loved the book and have noticed the closer you are to Appalachia, the more it grips you. But the film adaptation doesn't capture it. That's got nothing to do with politics. Read the book, everybody

I appreciate this Jane. I think Glenn's point (I know him a bit personally) is that some subset of the critics seem mad that the movie was made (or the book written) in the first place. And I do think he's got a point there.

The movie was a mirror image of my upbringing to the point I thought it was about me at times and I'm thankful for his testimony. It brought out emotions and memories that I've been hiding for years. It's helped me open up to Rachel about it and also forgive my mother.

family and she had to turn it off because it rang too true. Don't let the critics get Agreed. The movie wasn't as good as the book. Glenn Close in those glasses talking about family reminded me so much of my Grandma. Her talking about family felt like it was pulled directly from my brain. My Grandma was a KY

Has anyone written a good essay about the whole "I believe in science/trust the scientists" phenomenon which is more a lifestyle brand than an actual belief in the scientific method which is a process, not a set of facts handed down like the Bible?

I'm probably the worst person to substantively respond to your actual question. I've found generally that the people who are most offended tend to ascribe views to me I don't actually have, but it comes with the territory and I'm at least glad most people are engaging positively.

I have the book on order after watching the movie. Loved the movie. WV gal here whose family was intact but with lots of obstacles to overcome to "get there." I sort of likened your story to Jeannette Walls' Glass Castles. Glad your attitude about the naysayers is so positive.

I've not followed your writing or interviews outside of the book. Seeing some of the replies... if true, many things I might not agree with.

But I still say overall, that honest, open, thoughtful discussion is what we need more of not less.

I was and remain perplexed about Vance's social/political takes. But with respect to the book at least, I thought it was very well written and tough to put down. It was also far less political than I expected (which was fine with me either way).

The "public square" is only on Twitter for people who choose to live their world like that... and most Americans don't

But this is the result of the world your side created... unfettered belief in the free market, no government interference and corporate personhood

And then when it happens...you blame the Left.

It's tiresome. Our corporate overlords are a direct result of GOP policies since the Reagan era. Policies you trumpeted in your book.

Seeing reports the Biden administration is going to push for amnesty. Here's Bernie Sanders in 2015 arguing that global corporations use excess immigration to steal wages from the working and middle class.

The Biden admin is considering domestic travel restrictions while effectively inviting millions to come here in the middle of a global pandemic. Even left wing governments (like New Zealand) have closed the border. What a joke.

Also what about the service sector workers (many of whom are first gen immigrants!) who've been totally slammed by COVID restrictions. Do they really need massive wage competition right now? This plan solves no actual problem the country faces.

The Texas power/water outage story is just depressing. We're the richest country in the world and one of our biggest states has gone days with major infrastructure gaps. Sometimes feels like we're becoming a country where nothing works like it's supposed to.

Cuomo killed hundreds (if not thousands) of elderly people with his stupidity and earned praise from every corner of the corporate press. This was obvious last spring.

They're turning on him now because he sexually harassed a few staffers.

Florida is a lot older and did better on an age-adjusted basis.

Don't take my word for it. The piece you're dunking on makes that exact point.

“Jail-like facilities”

Also if your immigration policy leads to an explosion of kids brought dangerously across the border, it's not compassionate—it's vile. Actions have consequences, and the Biden admin should own this disaster (and God-willing, reverse course).

Peter Baker @peterbakernyt

The number of migrant children in custody along the border has tripled in the past two weeks to more than 3,250, and many of them are being held in jail-like facilities for longer than the three days allowed by law @KannoYoungs @shearm nytimes.com/2021/03/08/us/

One way of making the military less woke would be to eliminate the university degree requirement from the officer corps. It's dumb to make people get a BA before becoming officers anyway.

“Biden promised us!” wailed another woman.

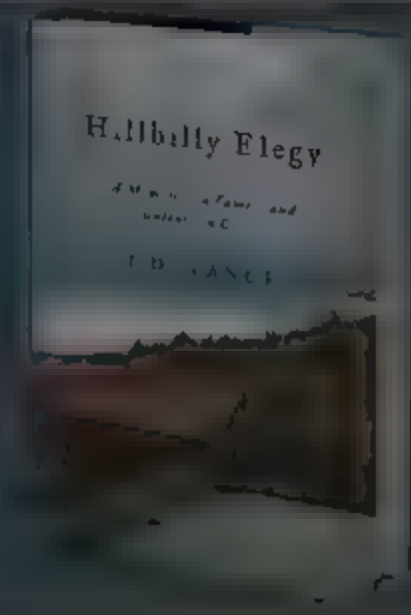

Many of the migrants said they had spent their life savings and gone into debt to pay coyotes — human smugglers — who had falsely promised them that the border was open after President Biden’s election.

The choice to have a porous border is a choice. Changing that would require more enforcement and more willingness to turn people away. It may mean fewer migrants making a dangerous journey, yes, but it would also mean less misery for Americans. That makes it worthwhile.

President Biden needs to level with the American people about the fact that his "infrastructure" package is a $2.25 trillion liberal wish list with only about 25% being spent on traditional infrastructure like roads, bridges, tunnels and rails. Be honest with us Mr. President.

Alright, here's a story about how the media often shapes narratives instead of reporting the truth, and how a small untruth can morph into a lie that's repeated again and again throughout the media bubble. But first, let me tell you about Appharvest

J.D. Vance

@JDVance1

Appharvest is an agricultural technology company in Kentucky. I got involved four years ago, and have been a supporter and investor of the company ever since. I've seen it morph from an idea into a publicly traded company with the potential to transform our food system.

I love this company, the people involved, and the founder, who has become a dear friend. But my ability to be useful now that it's a public company is limited, I'm thinking about a political run, and whatever I do politically, I hate the insane reigning political orthodoxy.

J.D. Vance · @JDVance1 · 15 Sek

so last month, I started talking with other members of the board about stepping down. The basic thinking was, I'm going to keep speaking my mind, and I'd rather do that unconstrained by the demands of a public board. And I thought the company would be better off too.

1 1 1

J.D. Vance · @JDVance1 · 15 Sek

Now, do I think this is unfair? Yes. Do I think progressive board members at public companies are worried about their viewpoints affecting their companies? Obviously not, and the last few weeks have shown everyone corporate America is totally in the tank for the left.

But this is the reality we face, and it's a "political" problem. In other words, the marriage between the left and corporate power isn't going to end through any other means than political intervention. So better to fight it on that front than turn Appharvest into a flashpoint.

On April 13, Bloomberg's @deenashanker posted a story that said Appharvest announced my departure "in response" to a Bloomberg inquiry about my "controversial statements." I was only asked for comment "via LinkedIn," which is kind of like asking me for comment through MySpace.

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 · 31 s

The clear implication is that I was forced down because of my tweets. The only problem? The two "controversial" tweets were posted on April 9, at 3:58, and on April 12. In other words, I resigned before I sent the tweets. And the suggestion that I was forced down is absurd.

I've seen this lie repeated in any number of media outlets, from local Louisville and Cincinnati papers to national outlets like the Washington Post. But let me just say again: the idea that I was forced out of Appharvest because of some tweets is obviously untrue. It is a lie.

Appharvest is an agricultural technology company in Kentucky. I got involved four years ago, and have been a supporter and investor of the company ever since. I've seen it morph from an idea into a publicly traded company with the potential to transform our food system.

I love this company, the people involved, and the founder, who has become a dear friend. But my ability to be useful now that it's a public company is limited, I'm thinking about a political run, and whatever I do politically, I hate the insane reigning political orthodoxy...

so last month, I started talking with other members of the board about stepping down. The basic thinking was, I'm going to keep speaking my mind, and I'd rather do that unconstrained by the demands of a public board. And I thought the company would be better off too.

On April 13, Bloomberg's @deenashanker posted a story that said Appharvest announced my departure "in response" to a Bloomberg inquiry about my "controversial statements." I was only asked for comment "via LinkedIn," which is kind of like asking me for comment through MySpace.

The clear implication is that I was forced down because of my tweets. The only problem? The two "controversial" tweets were posted on April 9, at 3:58, and on April 12. In other words, I resigned before I sent the tweets. And the suggestion that I was forced down is absurd.

I've seen this lie repeated in any number of media outlets, from local Louisville and Cincinnati papers to national outlets like the Washington Post. But let me just say again: the idea that I was forced out of Appharvest because of some tweets is obviously untrue. It is a lie.

This is how too many in our press operate, and it's why the media is one of the least trusted institutions in society: gin up a story, run it without proper sourcing, and let it run through multiple outlets. To everyone that's run this lie: please do your stealth edits.

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 · 1 Mn

Now, do I think this is unfair? Yes. Do I think progressive board members at public companies are worried about their viewpoints affecting their companies? Obviously not, and the last few weeks have shown everyone corporate America is totally in the tank for the left.

1 1 2

J.D. Vance @JDVance1 · 1 Mn

But this is the reality we face, and it's a "political" problem. In other words, the marriage between the left and corporate power isn't going to end through any other means than political intervention. So better to fight it on that front than turn Appharvest into a flashpoint.

I am proud to announce that I have founded a new center for narrative, legal, and policy warfare, called Battlefront, and joined the Manhattan Institute as a senior fellow, where I will lead a new initiative on Critical Race Theory.

This year, I will produce a series of investigative reports and feature essays for City Journal. I will then operationalize this work through Battlefront, where I will produce films, wage legal warfare, and advise policymakers on legislation.

At this very moment there are companies (big and small) paying good wages to American workers, investing in their communities, and making it easier for American families. Cut their taxes.
No more subsidies to the anti-American business class.

At this very moment there are companies (big and small) paying good wages to American workers, investing in their communities, and making it easier
for American families. Cut their taxes.
No more subsidies to the anti-American
business class.

Tucker Carlson is the only powerful figure who consistently challenges elite dogma—on both cultural and economic questions. That is why they try to destroy him. Don't fall for it this time, or any other.

Tucker Carlson is the only powerful figure who consistently challenges elite dogma—on both cultural and economic questions. That is why they try to destroy him. Don't fall for it this time, or any other.

Tucker Carlson is the only powerful figure who consistently challenges elite dogma—on both cultural and economic questions. That is why they try to destroy him. Don't fall for it this time, or any other.

Tucker Carlson is the only powerful figure who consistently challenges elite dogma—on both cultural and economic questions. That is why they try to destroy him. Don't fall for it this time, or any other.

Numbers gathered between 2013 and 2020 indicate that Black people are three times more likely to be killed by police than white people, despite being 1.3 times more likely to be unarmed than white people. These figures are amplified when looking at the country's largest cities.

In 47 of the 50 largest U.S. cities, police killed Black people at higher rates than white people. In Chicago, police killed Black people at a rate 22 times more than that for white people, based on killings per 100,000 population. In Miami, racial disparities could not be calculated because every person killed by the city's police department was Black or brown.

Men are more than 3 times likely to be struck by lightning than women. Would you say lightning strikes for either group are routine?

To make this more explicit, how "routine" something is depends on absolute numbers not relative comparison.

Wokeness has made you dumb, Will.

This is also true/fair. But I was actually making a much simpler point: that whether something is “routine” is not a function of relative comparison, but of absolute numbers. To me, 1,200 deaths, 100 of which are unarmed, does not mean “murder” by cops is “routine.”

If you actually waited for the CDC to give you permission to stop wearing a mask outdoors after you've been vaccinated, you have no shot of becoming an entrepreneur. Keep your day job.

The establishment critique of universal daycare is that it spends too much money.

The better critique is that it's terrible for children, and that a healthy society should make it easier for parents to care for kids. Spend money on parents, not corporate daycare.

Universal daycare is bad: a massive subsidy to our corporate class, a huge encouragement for parents to enter the labor force, all in the name of "liberation" and increased GDP.

JD Vance is not opposed to child care tout court. But he is opposed to Biden's plans to dramatically expand govt-funded child care. @JDVance1 explains why in @WSJopinion w/ Jenet Erickson. His opposition is partly about its likely effect on kids:

wsj.com/articles/biden ...

Moreover, the available empirical data contradict Ms. Oster's argument. In 1997 the provincial government of Quebec began offering child care for 5 Canadian dollars a day to all families, regardless of income. Almost two decades later, economists Michael Baker, Kevin Milligan and Jonathan Gruber found that children from two-parent families who participated showed significant increases in anxiety, aggression and hyperactivity. Those effects persisted—and even grew—as they reached young adulthood. Self-reported health and life satisfaction decreased significantly. Boys who participated were more likely to commit crimes. It was, to put it bluntly, a disaster for Quebec's children.

The establishment critique of universal daycare is that it spends too much money.

The better critique is that it's terrible for children, and that a healthy society should make it easier for parents to care for kids.
Spend money on parents, not corporate daycare.

Some of the stealth edits that Vox made to its article debunking "conspiracy theories" that Covid-19 originated in a lab leak between its original publication in March 2020 and now.

The Wuhan Institute of Virology is a real place, and the exact origin of the novel coronavirus is still a mystery, with researchers racing since the outbreak began to figure it out. But already, virologists who've parsed the genome and infectious disease experts who study coronaviruses have more than enough evidence to show that the virus is brand new and came from nature.

not the Wuhan lab.

A large group of them, citing genome analyses from multiple countries, recently affirmed in The Lancet that the virus originated in wildlife

The emergence of the virus in the same city as China's only level 4 biosafety lab, it turns out, is pure coincidence.

I just can't face them. How do I look upon a man with honest eyes, knowing I'm here breathing, laughing, complaining and he's lying dead beneath my ... us. I can't have that tough conversation with any of them. The one where I tell them I miss them. Where I say I'm sorry and they

One of the best arguments for immigration restriction is that we're clearly unable to take care of the people already here. Why let in a large number of desperate newcomers when many of our biggest cities look like this?

It's hard. We definitely need to take a run at government actuaries but this isn't merely housing related. Black box "algorithms" and sweetheart contracting is a huge subsidy of many industries. Housing insurance is one.

Further context: the egg was about 5 yards from the nest. Other than the single rogue egg nothing seems amiss. Given where the nest is it's unlikely to have dropped out of the nest and gotten that far away.

Brett Kavanaugh absolutely nails it in his takedown of the NCAA and it's abusive system of student employment: "The NCAA is not above the law."

To be sure, the NCAA and its member colleges maintain important traditions that have become part of the fabric of America—game days in Tuscaloosa and South Bend; the packed gyms in Storrs and Durham; the women's and men's lacrosse championships on Memorial Day weekend; track and field meets in Eugene; the spring softball and baseball World Series in Oklahoma City and Omaha; the list goes on. But those traditions alone cannot justify the NCAA's decision to build a massive money-raising enterprise on the backs of student athletes who are not fairly compensated. Nowhere else in America can businesses get away with agreeing not to pay their workers a fair market rate on the theory that their product is defined by not paying their workers a fair market rate. And under ordinary principles of antitrust law, it is not evident why college sports should be any different. The NCAA is not above the law.

A real estate agent in Cincy told me it's nearly impossible for first time buyers to get homes right now. They need to waive inspections and pay 20-30 percent above asking. Most people simply can't do that.

We have a massive spike in violent crime because police officers are afraid to do their jobs. Any "crime prevention" effort that focuses on job training or gun seizures is a giant distraction.

The other garbage talking point is that "defund the police" hasn't led to substantial funding restrictions. See below for dishonest framing from ABC. But the point is that cops are terrified to do their jobs, which makes our cities unsafe.

These people are insane

baltimoresun.com/opinion/op-ed/... As homicides dramatically increase across the nation, a question has emerged as to why Baltimore City is an exception. What are we doing right in Baltimore that other places are not doing?

My only thought on the NYC election is that I wish we didn't live in a third world country that takes weeks to count votes.

Someone put the manager of the Oakley Chik Fil A in charge of vote counting. We'll know who the mayor of NYC is before dinner tonight.

We should go back to having an election day in this country.

Breitbart News @BreitbartNews

@JDVance1 says he supports common sense election integrity measures, such as voter ID, and a return to an Election Day instead of multi-week voting.
